BRIEF OF EVANDRO S. SANTINI AND SANTINI HOMES, INC. AS AMICI CURIAE
IN SUPPORT OF PETITIONERS
SAN REMO HOTEL, L.P., ET AL.

Evandro S. Santini and Santini Homes, Inc. of Vernon, Connecticut, have received the parties' consent to file this brief as amici curiae through blanket letters of consent filed with the Clerk of the Court.

INTEREST OF EVANDRO S. SANTINI
AND SANTINI HOMES, INC.¹

Evandro Santini has built homes and apartments for 37 years in the suburbs of Hartford, Connecticut. After immigrating to the U.S. in 1957 at age 17, he served several apprenticeships in the building trades. He founded Santini Homes, Inc. in 1970, and has been its president ever since.

From 1994 through 2004, Mr. Santini and his company (hereinafter "Santini") litigated through the Connecticut courts and then the federal courts a temporary taking case that vividly illustrates what commentators and courts have referred to as the Williamson County "conundrum" and its jurisdictional "Catch 22." Santini v. Connecticut Hazardous Waste Management Service, 251 Conn. 661, 739 A.2d 680 (1999), cert. denied, 530 U.S. 1225 (2000); slip op., No. 3:01 CV 563 (WWE), August 27, 2002 (D. Conn.), affirmed on other grounds, ¹Pursuant to Rule 37.6 of this Court, the amici state that no counsel for any party authored any part of this brief, or paid for it. No one other than the amici or their counsel have made a monetary contribution to its preparation.

342 F.3d 118 (2d Cir. 2003), cert. denied, 73 U.S.L.W. 3211 (2004). Simply summarized, because Santini adhered to the “state-court-first” requirement created by this Court in Williamson County Regional Planning Commission v. Hamilton Bank, 473 U.S. 172 (1985), it took ten years to obtain a ruling on the merits of his Fifth Amendment taking claim. The tortuous path required of Santini illustrates why this requirement should be overruled or at least clarified and mitigated.

Santini’s claim arose from a public agency’s designation of his under-construction residential subdivision as a finalist for condemnation as a disposal site for low-level radioactive waste. As of June 9, 1991, Santini was building a fully-approved residential subdivision on 74 acres in Ellington, Connecticut. He had been working on the project for six years and had invested $5 million and borrowed $4 million to finance it.

The Connecticut Hazardous Waste Management Service (“Service”) is a public instrumentality and political subdivision of the State. Its principal duty is to oversee the handling and disposal of radioactive materials, including the identification, acquisition, and construction within Connecticut of a disposal facility for low-level radioactive waste.

On June 10, 1991, after two years of secret deliberations, the Service announced that the Santini development was one of three finalist sites for condemnation for public use as a disposal site for in-state generators (utilities, hospitals, universities, and industrial companies) of low-level radioactive waste. Shortly thereafter, the Hartford Courant newspaper displayed on its front page a map of the Santini subdivision next to the symbol for radioactivity.

Residents and public officials in Ellington and surrounding towns reacted to the announcement with protests and civil disobedience. In January 1992, Connecticut's governor proposed revocation of the agency's mandate to condemn an in-state site, in favor of seeking a municipality to volunteer. The legislature took four months to adopt the revocation, which was signed into law on May 5, 1992. By this time, however, economic use of the Santini development had been extinguished, and this continued until at least June 1993.

Since, under Williamson County, Santini could not bring a threshold taking claim in federal court, he sued (in March 1994) in state court under the takings clause of the Connecticut Constitution, Article I, §11 ("The property of no person shall be taken for public use, without just compensation therefor"). In a 1999 decision, the Connecticut Supreme Court confirmed the accuracy of Santini's 1994 choice of forum and theory of liability, holding under Williamson County that a Fifth Amendment taking claim cannot be joined with a state law taking claim that is brought in state court. See Melillo v. New Haven, 732 A.2d 133, 143 n.28 (1999).

Notwithstanding the exclusive state law basis of his taking claim, Santini expressly argued that the Connecticut courts, when interpreting the state's taking clause, must afford no less protection than is provided by the Takings Clause of the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Citing, for example, Mills v. Rogers, 457 U.S. 291 (1982), and Prune Yard Shopping Ctr. v. Robins, 447 U.S. 74 (1980), Santini explained that decisions of this Court interpreting the Bill of Rights furnish the "floor" for protection of civil rights, and thus in interpreting the state's taking clause, the Connecticut courts needed to adhere to Fifth Amendment tests and standards. In making this argument, Santini reviewed how Connecticut's two takings tests, which date to the 1960's and 1970's, were inconsistent with current federal standards and, in particular, with this Court's takings test as set forth in Penn Central Transport Co. v. New York City, 438 U.S. 104 (1978), Lucas v. South Carolina Coastal Council, 505 U.S. 1003 (1992), and their progeny.

In November 1999, the Connecticut Supreme Court, in a 5-2 en banc decision, affirmed a trial court denial of Santini's taking claim on the basis of two state law principles that were plainly inconsistent with this Court's takings jurisprudence, 739 A.2d 680 (1999). The court framed the dispositive issue as "whether mere government planning may constitute a taking, in the form of an inverse condemnation." It held that "mere governmental planning and temporary steps in anticipation of condemnation" do not, as a matter of Connecticut law, constitute a taking. It further held as a matter of state law that since the Service had never reached a "fixed and irreversible intent" to condemn the Santini property, no taking had occurred. The court cited First English Evangelical Lutheran Church of Glendale v. Los Angeles County, 482 U.S. 304, 320 (1987), as stating an analogous, one-factor taking test and a conclusion that "depreciation in value of the property by reason of preliminary [government] activity" cannot constitute a taking.

Because it had resolved Santini's taking claim on these state law bases, the court noted, 739 A.2d at 688 n.19, that it was "not necessary to discuss the plaintiffs' factual claims" of the economic impact of the June 1991 siting designation on their property. The court then rejected as irrelevant the takings jurisprudence of this Court:

[T]he plaintiffs argue that we may not interpret the Connecticut Constitution so as to provide less protection for individual rights in the use of property than what they refer to as a “minimum, national standard for protection of individual rights in the use of property” as furnished by the “fifth amendment.” In the plaintiffs’ view, the constitutional doctrine that the federal constitution provides “minimum, national” standards means that, when the United States Constitution is interpreted to grant rights thereunder, our state constitution must be interpreted to grant at least the same level of protection as that granted by the federal constitution. What is meant by that doctrine, however, is irrelevant to this case.

739 A.2d at 688 n.20 (emphasis added). The court did not explain further. Finally, the majority dismissed the relevance of Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 U.S. 374 (1994), Lucas, and Penn Central “because none of them involves mere planning by the government.” 739 A.2d at 689.

Santini petitioned this Court for a writ of certiorari and was denied, 530 U.S. 1225 (2000).²

²The Questions Presented were:

1. Whether a state court, adjudicating an inverse condemnation claim that a property owner has brought in that court under a state law provision because a Fifth Amendment takings claim is not yet ripe under this Court’s holding in Williamson County Regional Planning Commission v. Hamilton Bank, must nonetheless adhere to the standards established by this Court’s decisions interpreting the Takings Clause of the Fifth Amendment, and may not fashion its own, contrary takings standards.

Having satisfied the Williamson County state court requirement – after six years of litigation – Santini then brought a Fifth Amendment taking claim in federal district court in early 2001. On August 27, 2002 (in an unreported slip opinion, No. 3:01 cv 563 (WWE)), the court granted the Service’s Motion to Dismiss for lack of jurisdiction. After reciting undisputed facts regarding Santini’s development during 1984-91, his vested property rights, and his investment-backed expectations prior to June 1991, the court turned to the Rooker-Feldman doctrine, describing it as depriving a federal court of subject matter jurisdiction if “the exercise of jurisdiction over that case would result in the reversal or modification of a state court judgment.” Rooker-Feldman’s prohibition, it said, reached not only claims expressly raised or decided in the state court, but also all claims “inextricably intertwined,” with the scope of “intertwined” being determined by applying the elements of res judicata and collateral estoppel.

The court then shifted its focus to Williamson County and observed that “Federal law demarcates no clear approach to determine the preclusive effect of a previous

2. Whether the Connecticut Supreme Court, adjudicating a claim that a state agency economically idled for two years property on which a subdivision was being built by designating that land as a low-level radioactive waste disposal facility, violated the Takings Clause of the Fifth Amendment by dismissing as “irrelevant” the standards established by this Court in Penn Central Transportation Company v. New York City, First English Evangelical Lutheran Church of Glendale v. Los Angeles County, and Lucas v. South Carolina Coastal Council, and by holding that because the agency never demonstrated a “fixed and irreversible intent” to condemn, its action was “mere government planning” and could never be a temporary taking as a matter of law.

state court action instituted . . . in order to satisfy [its] ripeness requirement” It reviewed holdings of the Tenth and Eleventh Circuits that a Fifth Amendment claim must be raised in the state court proceedings. It then recited the contrary view of Dodd v. Hood River County, 59 F.3d 852 (9th Cir. 1995), that a federal taking claim may be brought after state court proceedings, but that the federal court must then determine whether the state court provided a determination “equivalent” to a federal adjudication, “so as to invoke . . . issue preclusion.” The district court chose to follow Dodd. However, in conducting this search for an equivalent adjudication, the district court focused primarily on whether the Connecticut Supreme Court had engaged in a good faith effort to address the merits of the claim. It did not conduct a comparison of whether the Connecticut Supreme Court’s 1999 adjudication of Santini’s state law claim had employed or adhered to this Court’s three-factor Penn Central analysis or its categorical Lucas formulation. The district court was also “unpersuaded . . . that collateral estoppel or Rooker-Feldman is inapplicable in light of the state court’s failure to consider the tests set forth in Lucas and Penn Central.”

Santini appealed. In briefs and arguments in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, Santini argued principally that because he had had no opportunity to litigate a Fifth Amendment claim in the state court, and because the Connecticut courts assuredly did not provide him with the equivalent of an adjudication under Penn Central and Lucas, the federal district court erred in dismissing the case on jurisdictional grounds.

In August 2003, the Second Circuit reversed the district court on the jurisdictional issues, accepting Santini’s argument that he had proceeded in state court involuntarily and had been prohibited in that forum from litigating his Fifth Amendment claim. 342 F.3d 118 (2003).³ However, the Second Circuit reached the merits, holding that the Service's 1991 actions were "precondemnation" activity that had not caused a taking. Santini petitioned this Court for a writ of certiorari,⁴ which was denied in 2004.

³By the time the Santini case reached the Second Circuit, the events giving rise to the taking claim had occurred ten to twelve years earlier. Among other things, the defendant's appraiser had died, and had the Second Circuit remanded to the trial court for an evidentiary hearing on the merits, that hearing would have examined events occurring more than a decade earlier.

⁴The Questions Presented were:

1. Did the Second Circuit err in interpreting Agin v. Tiburon, 447 U.S. 255 (1980), and First Evangelical Lutheran Church of Glendale v. Los Angeles County, 482 U.S. 304 (1987), as holding that "precondemnation activity" is categorically exempt from liability under the Takings Clause of the Fifth Amendment?

2. Did the Second Circuit contravene several decisions of this Court by holding that an agency's proposed condemnation of an under-construction subdivision for public use as a radioactive waste disposal facility, which action continued for eleven months and undisputedly reduced the property's value from approximately $2 million to zero for at least 24 months and undermined a $5 million equity investment, was not a taking on the grounds that it was incomplete "regulatory" action of "short duration," and protecting the condemnation process from liability was "sound public policy?"

ARGUMENT

THIS COURT SHOULD OVERRULE THE WILLIAMSON COUNTY STATE COURT REQUIREMENT OR, IN THE ALTERNATIVE, CLARIFY THAT REQUIRED STATE COURT LITIGATION DOES NOT EXTINGUISH, PRECLUDE, OR LIMIT A SUBSEQUENT FEDERAL CLAIM.

The Santini case provides a compelling example of how the Williamson County state court requirement consigns a property owner who seeks adjudication of a federal taking claim to a long and tortuous path of litigation that few property owners can sustain, and which effectively denies the protection of the Takings Clause of the Fifth Amendment.

In bringing his taking claim, Santini followed Williamson County. He brought his claim in state court under the Takings Clause of the Connecticut Constitution. When he brought his case in state court in 1994, Santini's pleading options were unclear. On the one hand, Williamson County, on its face, appeared to say that a federal taking claim did not then exist, which would mean logically that it could not have pleaded, reserved, or stayed. On the other hand, the Connecticut Supreme Court's takings jurisprudence had not been updated to reflect Penn Central or Lucas, and thus to proceed under the state constitution appeared to require arguing that the state court must overrule several of its earlier decisions. Santini chose to plead the state constitution and argue that the takings cases of this court provided the floor for interpreting the state's takings clause. Santini's pleading choice in this regard was subsequently validated by this Court in City of Monterey v. Del Monte Dunes, 526 U.S. 687, 710 (1999) (a Fifth Amendment taking claim "did not accrue" until state court proceedings terminated), and in the Connecticut Supreme Court's previously-mentioned Melillo decision (plaintiffs were “not entitled to consideration of [a Fifth Amendment taking claim] because of the existence of a legally sufficient procedure, under [the Takings Clause of the Connecticut Constitution”]), 732 A.2d at 143 n.28.

The Connecticut Supreme Court opinion, however, affirmatively violated this Court’s Fifth Amendment Takings Clause jurisprudence in several ways. It rejected the principle that decisions of this Court interpreting the Fifth Amendment furnish minimum national standards for the analysis and adjudication of takings claims brought in state court under available state remedies. It dismissed as irrelevant, without explanation, the three-factor Penn Central test, First English’s recognition of temporary takings, and the Lucas categorical formulation of a taking resulting from a total loss of economic use. Because of its application of state law principles, the Connecticut court found it unnecessary to analyze the economic impact of the Service’s action on the Santini property; this inquiry, of course, constitutes the first factor of the Penn Central analysis and the starting point of the Lucas test. The state court declined to employ the principle of Armstrong v. U.S., 364 U.S. 40, 49 (1960), that the purpose of federal Takings Clause is to avoid having an individual bear an economic burden that should, in fairness, be borne by the general public. In addition, the Connecticut opinion employed a governmental “intent to condemn standard,” in direct contradiction to such cases as Hughes v. Washington, 389 U.S. 290, 298 (1967) (government’s intent not relevant to takings analysis). Further, it stated in dictum, that all takings claims require evidence of complete economic loss, thereby contravening several decisions of this Court that recognize taking claims based on partial economic loss. Finally, by employing an intent standard, the Connecticut court effectively eliminated inverse condemnation claims in Connecticut because an inverse taking, by definition, arises from a total or severe impact on economic use that has occurred without intent to formally condemn.

Thus, it is beyond argument that Santini could not have brought his Fifth Amendment claim in federal court, but when Santini litigated his taking claim in state court under state law, he most assuredly did not receive, expressly or implicitly, an adjudication that was consistent with this Court's Fifth Amendment standards.

Worse, the federal district court dismissed Santini's Fifth Amendment Takings Clause claim for lack of jurisdiction. Although the Second Circuit reversed the jurisdictional dismissal and addressed the merits, it took Santini ten years and hundreds of thousands of dollars to achieve that result. It should also be noted that in the Second Circuit, Santini was forced to devote most of his appeal brief to the jurisdictional issues, and thus when the Second Circuit sua sponte reached and decided the merits, it did so based on briefs that barely touched upon the merits (and as a likely result, it misstated some critical testimony and misapprehended a portion of Santini's theory of liability for a taking).

In light of his experience as a litigant, Santini respectfully offers the following observations and prescriptions for resolving the issue before this Court:

1. The root of the problem arising from Williamson County's state court requirement is whether a litigant proceeding in state court as required by this Court's 1985 decision is required to raise, permitted to raise, or prohibited from raising a Fifth Amendment taking claim. In interpreting Williamson County, the federal courts have
